“I'm extremely excited to announce HyperMotion Technology is coming to FIFA,” said Adam Cregan, Head of FIFA Club, Pro Clubs, and Development. “We've already started working on it back in the summer and I can't wait to see it coming to life and see the incredible things we can do with it.”

“We have had tremendous support from the sport community at EA SPORTS and also from the international footballing community over the last few years, and we are very excited to share what we have in store for the future,” added David Rutter, SVP of FIFA. “It's also important to recognise FIFA 20 showed football fans the potential of our technology and with FIFA 22 we are able to continue our journey to create the most authentic and in-depth football experience.”

With the release of FIFA 20, the incredible amount of gameplay data was shared with the community. This led to the creation of new Player Movement and Player Trajectory technology, which has been expanded upon for FIFA 22. The speed and accuracy of player motion-capture is now up to 15x faster, and players can now gain an advantage by moving more quickly than their opponents. Players also have access to a “Move

Assist” feature, which gives a player an additional boost at the start of their run by subtly guiding them with guidance prompts. "Moving faster than your opponents isn't just a thing of the past - with HyperMotion Technology your speed, acceleration, and even playmaking ability can be increased to make you an unstoppable force when attacking," Cregan continued. "We're incredibly excited to bring new features to the game that will make you want to take the field in FIFA 22, as well as continue to deliver improved player data for you to immerse yourself in." For the first time in EA SPORTS FIFA, controls will be familiar to players from past FIFA titles, which will allow them to easily switch between playing FIFA and other EA SPORTS titles. The FIFA and Pro Clubs series have always used a unique on-screen D-pad, allowing for a more focused game experience. This feature will now be carried over to EA SPORTS FIFA. On-pitch controls will remain the same as previous iterations of the series, but players can now change settings for player attributes on the fly during gameplay with a new Attribute Toggle or through the redesigned Attribute Menu. Players can also now have
