So I can't find it through git reflog, which displays all the git commits and the log of them. As far as I can see the first commit is 0a3b0e8, and the branch was set to the state of 5f3ba98. So in addition to 1d9e98a the client has also modified 1742ae3 and ab00cc1. I can trace the way up to the branch, but not the way down. Is there a way to get to 1742ae3 and ab00cc1 using git reflog? A: For reflog: all reflog entries for a branch are remembered on a per-ref repository basis

Either one of these examples work when you run it in the Script Editor. When you execute the script in the.save file, it returns as a string. It also works with the python-docx-based docx package. Here's an example of the python interface: >>> import docx >>> docx.__version__ '1.2.5' >>> docx.__doc__ 'Part of the Python-docx package, this library implements the Common. document object model.' >>> from docx import Document >>> from docx import Namespace >>> w = Document(BytesIO(b"Download Clone Script --> www.3dbrew.org This Script Convert Exe to ISO --> www.fantasyste.us AllwaySync = Allway Sync 12.14.2 Activation Key --> www.cuelzy.com AllwaySync = Allway Sync 12.14.2 Activation Key --> www.freebbs.com AllwaySync = Allway Sync 12.14.2 Activation Key --> 3.3.3.3 0cc13bf012

No link, but it's not changed. A: You'll need to contact the web host. You might get lucky and they might have it set up already. But, if not, then you'll have to contact them. In 2011, Congress introduced the Tax Relief, Unemployment Insurance Reauthorization, and Job Creation Act of 2011, with the stated intention of helping the economy through the "fiscal cliff." It didn't quite work out as planned, but things might not have been all that terrible if it had, a post-election poll confirms. After some setbacks in the early going, such as the decision to extend Bush-era tax cuts, the cliff has become a matter of actual policy in the current debates. But it's not the whole story, as a Gallup poll conducted in January and February reveals. If a majority of Americans knew that the fiscal cliff had been solved, but also that major benefits to the rich continued, support for Congress would drop, from 48 percent, to 43 percent. Support for cutting spending on programs like Social Security, Medicaid, and Medicare was cut in half, from 26 percent to 13 percent. Gallup collected poll data from 991 Americans in an online poll in January and February, and then published a report on the results. Majorities of Democrats, Republicans, and independents all had higher levels of support for spending cuts than for tax hikes, and for cuts in Social Security, Medicare, Medicaid, and other social programs than for tax cuts. The survey findings included some interesting details on how strongly people believed in their positions. Those who thought cuts would result in higher unemployment were more inclined to favor cutting social programs, and those who thought cuts would increase unemployment were more inclined to favor raising taxes, presumably because of the uncertainty. But in both cases, majorities were in favor of cuts, which was the case as well for most opinions on other issues. The poll used hypothetical questions about tax hikes and spending cuts to get the results. Obama's office has released some stats with actual tax and spending changes attached. As The Washington Post's Chris Cillizza argues, the results suggest that Americans don't have a real problem with middle class tax hikes--just the opposite: while they think the cuts overall are good, they don't like that it would take money away from social programs. The poll also asked Americans who have volunteered to donate blood about their views of the fight over the fiscal cliff, and found that Congress is least popular
