for most of us, the internet is the de facto way to make the most of digital photography. however, your camera captures images that can be used in a number of ways. the selection of features you can use with your camera depends on your camera. many popular camera models capture images in raw format. a raw file contains a record of all the data in an image. however, not every raw file is created equal: some raw files may not contain enough data for creating a perfect image. the vast majority of digital camera models today, even those that aren't designed for raw (they do not use a raw format), still capture images in some variant of the jpeg format. raw data can be processed and even saved by many cameras, but it's a time-consuming process that often doesn't capture all the details that we would like. for this reason, some tools make the conversion from raw data into something usable as simple as possible. there is a native feature on some cameras that lets you directly convert raw data to a conventional jpeg image. you can change the settings within the camera itself, or you can use a picture editor like adobe lightroom. in the next steps, i show you the basic steps involved in jpeg conversion and workflow. as mentioned above, lightroom also allows you to do the conversion from raw files directly, or via an intermediate file. if you don't want to go through the hassle of converting raw files, you can always use free or inexpensive software like rawstudio to fix the problem. the first thing you need to do is make sure that your raw file is recognized by the software you are going to use to fix it. many applications can only recognize raw files from nikon cameras, for example, while other programs can recognize files from a wider range of cameras.
